Research Project: The Role of Reputation and Corruption in Procurement
Nearly all activities in which the public sector is involved, from defense to transportation, from education to healthcare, require the public sector to procure works or goods from private contractors. Thus, it is crucial that the procedures through which procurement occurs be designed to avoid waste and enhance social welfare. Preventing corruption and ensuring contractor compliance with their obligations constitute primary design goals. Nevertheless, very limited evidence exists as to how different awarding methods are susceptible to corruption, and how contractors' past reputation should be used to award new tenders. This research entails three empirical projects that will advance the frontier of our understanding of the roles of corruption and reputation in procurement.

Job description:
Support to the principal investigator in the various activities required by the project: data collection and organization; writing econometric estimation codes (mainly in Python, but also in R, Matlab and Stata); literature analysis and reporting on it; reading and proofreading work (mainly in LaTex).
